The following words, abridgment, acknowledgment, and judgment, are to be found, with the orthography here given, in the English dictionaries which preceded the publication of Mr. Todd's improved edition of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. Todd altered Johnson's orthography of these words, by the insertion of an e, thus, abridgement, acknowledgement, judgement; and he remarks, "Several authors have revived this orthography, retaining the e to soften, as Lowth observes on judgement, the preceding g, and as Johnson himself analogically writes lodgement."

The English dictionaries of Jameson and Smart, which have appeared since the publication of Todd's edition of Johnson, also retain the e; and Smart remarks, in relation to the three words in question, that "Todd restores the e in order that they may not exhibit the otherwise unexplained irregularity of g soft before a consonant," and he "adopts the more correct, however less usual spelling." Many respectable writers now insert the e in these words. The omission of it, however, has been hitherto, and still continues to be, the prevailing usage; but it is perhaps not very improbable that the usage may yet be changed, and the more consistent orthography be generally adopted.

MIS, n. Loss; want; failure; omission; error; mistake. Shak. [l. Hurt; harm. Spenser.]

MISS, n. [contracted from mistress.] pl. MISSSES. A young girl; a term of respectful address to an unmarried female, prefixed to the name; as, Miss Smith, Miss Olivia—an unmarried female kept in concubinage; a kept-mistress. [“Miss, at the beginning of the last century, was appropriated to the daughters of gentlemen under the age of ten. Mistress was then the style of grown-up unmarried ladies, though the mother was living; and, for a considerable part of the century, maintained its ground against the infantine term of Miss.”—Todd.] See MIS-TRUST.

MISS With respect to the use of this title, when two or more persons of the same name are spoken of or addressed, there is a good deal of diversity. Some give the plural form to the name; as, “The Miss Smiths;”—others, to the title; as, “The Misses Smith.” In conversation, the former prevails; in written or printed composition, usage is divided; and in addressing letters, the latter is the more common. The following authorities are given in favor of the former mode, as used in composition:—“The Miss Cotterels.” James Northcote; James Boswell. “The Miss Wilkinsons.” Ed. Malone. “The Miss Penna.” Richard Rusk. “The Miss Porters.” Eclectic Review. “The two Miss Smiths.” Chambers’s Journal.—The following are in favor of the latter form:—“The Misses More.” Bp. Horne. “The two Misses Porter.” Sir Eg. Brydges. “The Misses Porter.” Charles Lamb. “The Misses Gosset.” Sir Robert Peel.—Those grammarians, who treat of the subject, generally favor the former mode, (Miss Smiths;) though some make an exception in addressing letters.—“The Miss Smiths”—much preferable to “The Misses Smith.” Grant’s Grammar.

The following remarks are quoted from Dr. Crombie’s Grammar: “Two or more substantives in concordance, and forming one complex name, or a name and title, have the plural termination annexed to the last only; as, ‘The two Miss Louisa Howards,’ ‘The two Miss Thomsons.’ Analogy, Dr. Priestley observes, would plead in favor of another construction, and lead us to say, ‘The two Misses Thomsons,’ ‘The two Misses Louisa Howard;’ for if the ellipsis were supplied, we should say, ‘The two young ladies of the name of Thomson,’ and this construction, he adds, he has somewhere met with. The latter form of expression, it is true, occasionally occurs; but general usage, and I am rather inclined to think, analogy likewise, decide in favor of the former; for, with a few exceptions, and these not parallel to the examples now given, we almost uniformly, in complex names, confine the inflection to the last substantive.—We say, indeed, ‘Messrs. Thomson;’ but we seldom or never say, ‘The two Messrs. Thomson,’ but ‘The two Mr. Thomsons.’”

Hiley, in his Grammar, says, “In conversation the plural termination is annexed to the last noun only. But in composition and addressing letters to individuals of the same name, we pluralize the title; as, ‘To the Misses Howard;’ ‘To Messrs. Thomson.’ But both in conversation and in composition we pluralize only the name of married ladies; as, ‘Mrs. Wilsons were there;’ ‘To Mrs. Howards.’”—Thus also Dr. Watts:—“May there not be Sir Isaac Newtons in every science?—You must not suppose the world is made up of Lady Aurora Grancliffes.”
